Digital switchover

In the meridian area analogue transmissions from terrestrial TV transmitters will cease in early 2012.

Most homes have more than one television and will need to upgrade every set to digital in one form or another to enable continuation of reception.

Although many homes cannot receive terrestrial digital transmissions now the power is expected to increase after the switchover. For more info on predicted reception now and after switchover at your postcode see www.digitaluk.co.uk.

Digital reception options

Freeview

If you are in an area predicted to be ok for reception then you may require an aerial upgrade to receive Freeview. Most new TVs have Freeview tuners built in. Older sets can be upgraded with the addition of a digital receiver box.

Freesat from Sky

Sky's basic receiver is available without subscription and offers several hundred free channels. It is possible to use multiple receivers from a single dish and you can upgrade to Sky at a later date.

Freesat from BBC

BBC have most of the channels that are available with the addition of several High Definition channels. A freesat + box is also available that enables recording onto a hard drive.

Sky Television

Sky offers a subscription service from £16.50 per month. There is a basic receiver option, Sky Plus that enables recording onto a hard drive and Sky HD that offers over 30 High definition channels and recording too. Sky multiroom allows different boxes to be used in other rooms with a small extra charge.
